

Covid-19 is an international health crisis that has changed the lives of everyone in Cardiff. As well as affecting people's health and wellbeing, the virus has caused other problems. Lots of businesses across the city were made to close temporarily and a lot of people are not able to go to work.

Once lockdown rules have been relaxed, Cardiff Council is planning on slowly reopening the city in a careful and safe way so that businesses can open again and people can go back to work.

Even though the lockdown has been scary and challenging, we have all learnt new things and we have grown because of it. A fresh start will help us shape our future. Many of the new changes will, not only make things safer, but help make Cardiff a better place to live, work, and play.

Some changes you might see...

Speed limits
(more 20mph zones)
making the roads a safer place for pedestrians and cyclists

More cycleways and bicycle parking
encouraging people to use active travel to move across and into the city

Wider pavements making social distancing easier

These changes will happen first in the city centre...

... then they will gradually spread across the wider city

One-way pedestrian routes
a safe and organised way of ensuring social distancing when there are lots of people

Welcome points with Street Ambassadors helping people understand the changes and making their visit safe

Queuing space
a safe space for people to queue for shops.

Changes to car parking; and traffic movement around the city centre reducing pollution, encouraging all forms of active travel

Spill-out areas outdoor seating areas to help restaurants, cafés and bars.

Planters and Parklets places to stop, rest and enjoy that improve the flow of people and make the city a greener place

Safe access to schools road closures, wider pavements and speed limits to make your journeys safer.
